Rocky Mountain Power Foundation grant helps individuals with disabilities

PARK CITY, Utah — The Rocky Mountain Power Foundation has awarded a $3,000 grant to the National Ability Center. The grant will help support its therapeutic equestrian hippotherapy program component of the summer Discovery Camps and Camp Giddy Up.

The National Ability Center's equestrian program is celebrating 20 years of providing adaptive horseback riding lessons to individuals with physical and cognitive disabilities. Each year, this program offers more than 3,500 lessons to children, teens and adults who benefit from the natural movement a horse's body provides.

"The National Ability Center has been a significant contributor to the community through its adaptive recreational programs," said Lori Hansen, Rocky Mountain Power customer and community manager. "We're happy to continue our support of an organization that positively affects so many lives."

"We're thankful to the Rocky Mountain Power Foundation for the help they are giving to our equestrian program participants with this grant," said Dale Schoon, chief executive officer of the National Ability Center. "The positive changes we see in people's lives when they participate in a program like this are beneficial to the participants, their families and the entire community."

The National Ability Center will use the money received from this grant to fund both adaptive and therapeutic horseback riding lessons. These lessons give individuals with disabilities the physical and cognitive progress they might not find in clinical settings. While the individual sees the most immediate benefits from the horseback riding experience, the community benefits as well. A recent Harris Interactive study showed that individuals with disabilities who participate in recreational activities are twice as likely as their peers to have jobs and thereby sustain their families.
